The protest was organised by grassroots activists in housing communities. It culminated in a large march through the streets of the capital, with more than 3,000 people demonstrating in front of Dáil Éireann. Fears of the damage Britain's departure could do to the peace process in Northern Ireland and a call for border checks between Northern Ireland and the Republic were among the main issues on the agenda. Both Sinn Féin and the Social Democrats supported the protest. The demonstration was organised by grassroots activists in housing communities. In a Facebook post, organisers said: "When we left our homes, we were given no guarantee of how we would be living. "We have been told we are welcome in the country, but we will not be welcome to live here and it doesn't appear as though our presence is going to be acknowledged. "We have been given no guarantees on our health care, our welfare, our housing. We will continue to be told what we can and can't do, whether we are a danger to the community or not, in other words we are just bodies to be profited from or expelled from." They said a new wave of evictions of people with disabilities was being conducted by Dublin City Council. They said about 200 homeless people had been removed from their homes since December. "This new wave of evictions doesn't have to do with the inability of families to afford their rent, it has to do with the Irish government and the city of Dublin changing the rules to evict people living in emergency accommodation," they added. They said the fact that rent arrears were not being recouped by councils "means that families are being evicted or their rent is being doubled". They said the protest was calling 2d92ce491b
